

The Oregonian

August 15, 2005

Many support personal accounts

The AARP has misrepresented some of its members on the issue of Social Security. There are a lot of grandparents out there who support voluntary personal retirement accounts. These accounts would allow parents to pass something on to their children and help ensure that our families are not left without any benefits when it comes time for them to retire.

I believe this is a very important decision and will affect young Americans for generations to come. It is important that we not play politics with the future of America's youth. Instead, we should focus on securing the same benefits for them that we enjoy.

The young men and women entering today's workforce are as bright and intelligent as ever. They deserve more control over their own future.

JANE MUNSEY